THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9.

STONEWALL JACKSON. -The ordinance of the Virginia Convention removing the militia officers above the rank of captain had given great offense to our volunteers, who, therefore, great offense to our volunteers, who, therefore, in old American Democratic style, had elected all their officers, either directly or through their representatives; and the idea of having these popular favorites superseded was abhorrent to the rank and file. It must be remembered that our volunteer companies, a sort of holiday soldiery up to that time, were made up of our best young men, who felt they had certain inalienable rights, among which was the right to elect their own officers; and glorious good fellows were these officers in times of peace, and many of them rose to high positions during the war-but there were some unfit for their places in time of war, and to get rid of these the Convention had to make a clean sweep of all.

Up to this time our little army at Harper's Ferry was a curiosity. We had about one thousand rank and file. There was one majorgeneral in command, with three brigadiers under him, and a corresponding number of field and staff officers; all were magnificently attired and epauletted-splendidly mounted, and surrounded with gorgeous retinues. Troops were scarce, but as for officers we were simply magnificent in numbers and display. When, therefore, Colonel Jackson, a quiet and tacitum gentleman, appeared upon the scene, with only an adjutant, who was also from the Institute, and both clad in old threadbare undress uniforms, and took a little room at the village hotel, and issued a short simple order assuming the command, and dismissing all our generals, and colonels, and lieutenant-colonels, and majors, and a multitude of staff officers "like unto the sands upon the seashore," there was great commotion, consternation, and indignation, all of that night, and the next day a mass meeting was called of the troops and deposed officers to consider what was going on, but Jackson kept quietly in his quarters awaiting orders from Richmond. These were brought by me from General Lee, and were the fruit of Gen. Harper's dispatches which I had taken to Richmond. I delivered them to Col. Jackson and repaired to my camp. My men were not much excited, because my battery was independent, and was not affected by the decapitation of officers. But the indigna-tion meeting was in full blast hard by, and defunct officers were denouncing the action of the Convention. Among the orders I had brought to Colonel Jackson was one directing him to muster all the companies into service for a year or during the war, at their option. I called my men together and explained this order, and they unanimously decided to muster in for the war. On reporting this to Colonel Jackson a half an hour later, he was much gratified, and had the company mustered in that evening. He then gave the first exhibition of his qualities as a commander by issuing a peremptory order to captains to muster their companies by ten o'clock next day, and never was the moral power of a determined will more certainly manifest than in the result of this order. The mass meeting had adjourned until next day. It never met again, for there was not an officer or man who dared resist the Colonel's order.-|"Reminiscences of Lee and Jackson," by Gen. F. D. Imboden, in November Galaxy.
